

Future-oriented remembrance work in international youth work

Gregor Christiansmeyer

Abstract

Dealing with often violent and traumatic aspects of history has a long tradition in international youth work – both for group exchanges and project work as well as in voluntary service. With a view to group-related project work, this article deals with the different demands made on youth exchanges related to the past, for example from a reconciliation perspective, in historical-political education or with a view to discrimination-sensitive approaches. On this basis, impulses are offered for the future-oriented further development of Dealing with the Past in international youth work.
